Introduction

In 1913 the Mental Deficiency and Lunacy (Scotland) Act was passed by Parliament. It gave statutory recognition to the distinction between mental illness and mental handicap and required District Boards of Control to provide institutions for the mentally handicapped separate from the asylums, which were now to concentrate on the treatment of the mentally ill.

It was some fifteen years later that the Edinburgh District Board of Control complied with the Act and bought the mansion house and estate of Gogarburn. The house had previously belonged to Edinburgh Corporation, and had been used as a home for convalescent and delicate children under school age.

By December 1924, the Hospital was open with 24 women patients in residence, and, in 1925, the stable block was adapted to accommodate 15 men.

The District Board now commissioned Stewart Kaye, the architect of Bangour Village Asylum, to design a colony for Gogarburn to accommodate, ultimately, 1,000 mentally handicapped people. The colony was designed as a small village, each house or block to take 50 patients under the supervision of a housekeeper. In 1929 the foundation stone of the new administrative block was laid by the Duke of York (later George VI). In April 1930 this building and the two villas close to it were formally opened by the Secretary of State for Scotland.

During this early period the Hospital bought its first farm, Kellerstain, to provide work and food for the patients (1925). In 1950 it added the farm of Gogarbank and the policies of Hanley Lodge.

Following the passing of the Local Government (Scotland) Act in 1929 the District Board of Control was disbanded and the administration of Gogarburn was transferred to Edinburgh Corporation and was managed by the Public Health Committee and the City's Medical Officer of Health.

Building went on steadily. In 1931 the school was opened and Scout and Guide troops were formed. In 1934 two more villas were opened. In 1936 two children's blocks were added, followed in 1938 by two "temporary" blocks for male patients. By the end of 1938 there were places for 540 patients.

In 1937, following a circular from the General Board of control a conference was held in Edinburgh and it was decided that, although Gogarburn should remain an Edinburgh corporation Hospital, it would be used by all the South Eastern authorities "provided the charges made to them by the Corporation were not excessive". Before this arrangement became effective World War II broke out.

In/

In 1940 the Government decided to include Gogarburn in the emergency service scheme. Two new villas, not yet in use, were taken over, and further accommodation for emergency purposes was acquired by transferring 130 men to Larbert Institution and by putting more patients in each ward. The hospital dealt with a steady flow of surgical cases from the Army and Airforce during 1940 while the transformation to an emergency hospital was being carried out under the guidance of Professor Learmonth.

In 1942 over 1,700 service and civilian patients were treated, and Gogarburn acquired a reputation for its highly specialised peripheral nerve unit.

In 1943 the 130 men who had been sent to Larbert institution were returned to Gogarburn, and, to ease the ensuing crowding, 30 youths were sent to Lennox Castle Hospital.

In 1944 admissions to the hospital were restricted and the complete staff of a surgical unit was transferred to a hospital in the south of England in preparation for the Normandy landings.

By 1945 there was a long waiting list of patients for Gogarburn as it returned to its original function. There was also an acute shortage of nursing staff.

In 1948 Gogarburn was transferred, under the National Health Service (Scotland) Act, to the South Eastern Regional Hospital Board, under its own Board of Management. The Board continued to try to provide a regional service against the perennial problem of staff shortages. Two new wards and an occupational therapy hut were build.

In 1960 the Mental Health (Scotland) Act was passed allowing for patients to be admitted on an informal basis instead of being certified and formally admitted. Gogarburn therefore developed from a custodial hospital where patients were cared for and were given work to do to bring in money, into a treatment and training centre. The emphasis changed from work to occupational therapy. This led to the provision of hostels and sheltered homes where patients who had benefited from training could go and live, thus leading more normal lives.

In 1969 the Gogarburn Board of Management was disbanded and the Hospital's management was transferred to the Board of the Royal Edinburgh Hospital. In 1971 two units for adolescents, and the Industrial Therapy Unit were opened, followed in 1972 by the Children's Unit.

In 1974 Gogarburn became part of the South Lothian District of Lothian Health Board, and in 1986 part of the Mental Health Unit. The hospital finally closed in May 1999.

7 Institution Registers of Defectives, 1915-1987

The early Registers were kept on behalf of the Board of Control.

The first Register begins before the founding of Gogarburn Hospital, and its early entries relate presumably to Bangour Village Hospital.

Information given includes patient's name, number, age, previous occupation, previous place of abode, parish council or school board to which chargeable, and by whose authority sent, dates of medical certificates and by whom signed, bodily condition, name of disease if any, class of defective, if epileptic, age at outset of mental deficiency and observations.

10 Register of Discharges and Removals, 1915-1990

These Registers fall into two categories: those relating to formal, or certified, patients; and those referring to informal patients.

The first Register, which predates the opening of Gogarburn, relates, presumably, to Bangour Village Hospital.

Information contained in the Registers includes patient's name, number, dates of admission and discharge, authority on which discharged or removed, place to where sent and observations.
